You'll gain access to additional forums, file attachments, board customizations, encrypted private messages, and much more! I'm using it now to write this post (which is proving to be a bit longer than anticipated). I've never used Stay on Top before and am wondering what do you think about it? -----The most important aspect of being a good mushroom grower is not speed but consistent quality. That being said I was considering building a bunch of adhesives into the substrate. I would want them to be compatible with wheat straw and pine sawdust. Are there any adhesives out there that work well with these substrates and wouldn't react with the growing substrate? Most adhesives are designed to work with wood. I was thinking of starting my own business selling to commercial mushroom growers. -----But again the Supreme Court is the end-all-be-all in any political discussion on this board. There is no reason to use a cloth with your shrooms. I use four different cloths. I use four different shapes of shrooms. Most of them are my own design. All the shapes come off the agar beds with zero damage to them. And I know this because I get a sample of every shroom. I take it to a microscope and do the job for myself. You will need to boil the shrooms for a few minutes so they will be softer. Soft shrooms are easy to work with. If you don't want to use a clapboard, you will need a press. The press should look like this. I have two clapboards in this configuration. They work great. I have a very large flat press and a smaller "button" press for the smallest mushrooms. I can get a shroom of this size in 2 minutes flat. The best thing about my shrooms is that they can be shaped into an almost infinite number of shapes. You would need a normal wood press and a power saw to cut the wood. If you want to get really fancy, you can add adhesives that stick to wood or to shrooms. I use a mix of wheat straw, pine sawdust,
