Category:Compatibility layers Category:Windows security software Category:Windows administrationContemporary UK and German attitudes to life-sustaining treatment in the dying process. The purpose of this study was to compare the views of UK and German patients and their family members on life-sustaining treatment in the dying process. The two countries are considered to be at opposite ends of the socio-economic spectrum with the UK being a 'middle class' nation with a high degree of social equality and the German being a 'middle class' nation with a high degree of social inequality. Three hundred and twenty-six patients with advanced cancer receiving active chemotherapy and their family members in six London hospitals and in two German hospitals were invited to complete questionnaires. Each of these questionnaires was analysed separately. In both the UK and Germany, most participants thought that life-sustaining treatment should not be withheld at the end of life. However, the UK participants were significantly more likely than their German counterparts to consider that providing active medical treatment to help the dying process should include provision of assisted hydration and nutrition. There was no difference between the two countries in terms of awareness of palliative care. These findings support the hypothesis that the attitudes of different socio-economic groups are not necessarily consistent.(1) Field of the Invention The invention relates to a device for changing the speed of a sewing machine.
